Does the school have to impose a new policy on the sports card?

Leo Tsai

Under the rise of the electricity bill, the school announced that students were required to buy sports card in order to get permission into the gym after 6 p.m. in this semester. Students have been wining about the inconvenience of this new policy for some of them think it will lessen their willingness to exercise. However, to look at this issue rationally, what is the proper attitude between the school and students should have?

First, let's talk about school officials' position. As far as we know, the utility bills have long been a headache for the school. The monthly zooming utility expense finally became the last straw forcing school administrators to issue this unwelcome policy. Moreover, more than half pupils are not willing to make a concession though the pay-as-you-use idea is quite plausible. The school should, however, provide more outlets for students to express their perspectives as well as give more information or explanations of the policy. Therefore, the both sides are able to have better communication and interactions.
